October 13th was a wonderfully clear, sunshiny day, in direct contrast to the week preceding, in which it had rained almost every day. As a consequence the sky was dotted with aeroplanes, flying at all heights and in all sorts of formations, and with observation balloons stretching away to the left and right as far as the eye could reach. A wonderful air battle took place almost directly over our gun positions, and within easy view of company headquarters. Four German planes tried to steal over to shoot down the observation balloon just back of headquarters. A barrage was immediately put up, which was dangerous, as there were so many English planes in the vicinity. The Allied machines, however, did not appear to notice the German planes. Antiaircraft guns opened up from hitherto concealed places all around us, but could not seem to hit the planes. The Jerries then, changing their plans, managed to separate one hapless English plane from his formation, and three of the German planes engaged him, while the fourth hovered around to give battle to any interrupting machines. All four fighting planes flew beautifully, doing nose dives, all sorts of turns, dips and spirals, firing at each other all the while. This continued for a few seconds, when suddenly the solitary British plane, crippled, circled slowly to the earth, making a safe landing between headquarters and our positions. The...
